

Quoting Steve Gill

What did you make of the ultra high volume up bar Jason - didn't that spook you out of a long?

Yes it would normally but even if I had closed out completely there were 4 more entries right after. I look at the bar right after it is a squat based on volume vs spread and a NS compared to the previous 2 bars. If that bar had been all sellers then we would've had more of a move away. Few bars later we had a NS / no selling pressure right into that trigger followed by a high volume test bar dipping below the trigger and closing above and on it's high... all signs that strength were still there and offering up more entries... another NS shortly after as well.

I did NOT close and waited for reaction off that bar as my hull was still blue... PA was still pulled away from the hull and well away and above the PAL (also both the hull and PAL were sloped well up).

Based on it's position and the fact that I had entered well below and had already banked some nins on my first lot I felt safe to watch the reaction after as the high volume could just as easily been buyers absorbing some supply with all that strength in the background.
